Cookie Crisis

History of the Issue

Since Sesame Street was founded, there comes a monster called Cookie Monster, who loves to eat cookies. He always desires to eat as much cookies as possible, and no one can stop him from eating those cookies, no matter if the cookie is his friends' or his neighbors'. One day, Sesame Street has finally run out of cookies, the citizens are blaming Cookie Monster for eating too much: not only his own cookies, but everyone's. Sesame Street Times pointed out that Cookie is an important part of their culture, and they should try to preserve it if possible.

Elmo, Ernie and his friends urge the Human Treat Council (HTC), originally HRC, Human Rights Council of the United Kitchens (UK), originally UN, United Nations) to try their best and find a way to preserve the mighty Cookie culture, but in the past few years, the United Kitchens ignored their problem, they dealt with global issues such as food trafficking (originally human trafficking) or the integrated safety of Sesame Street instead of managing the Cookie Crisis. Nowadays, there're more kinds of Cookie products and they exist everywhere, including COSTCO, Wal-Mart, etc, and the place Cookie exists means the place Cookie Monster probably might exist. It's not only about preserving the Cookie culture, but also about the safety of the city – Sesame Street. There's always a chance that Cookie Monster might come to YOUR house, and eat up all your cookies, so beware, and do not let Cookie Monster follow YOU.
